

Read more: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/bleedthefreak/news/?a=28435&t=Could_Bryan_Singer_Return_To_Direct_Another_iX-Meni_Movie

In 2000 The X-Men Franchise became one of the first comic book movies to hit it big at the box office and started what by now seems like a revolution of comics to the silver screen, The man behind the camera was Bryan Singer. The success of the first movie would lead to a sequel in 2003 with Singer again directing. Then when it came time for a third movie Singer dropped out and went on to direct Superman Returns. After the fans got a piece of X-Men: The Last Stand most were begging for Singer to return. Then we had the prequel X-Men: First Class, which was going to see Singer return as director. Then schedule conflicts forced Singer to take a smaller role as a producer with the original X-Men: The Last Stand, Matthew Vaughn taking the helm. In a set report for X-Men: First Class