

Sometime last year, rumors regarding who'd helm Fox's long-productive 'X-Men' spin-off Deadpool, suggested Sin City director Robert Rodriguez being a top contender. And with confirmation of "visual-effects" master Tim Miller on board, Rodriguez has opened up with MTV News, addresses the past allegations. "I was working with Fox already on 'Predators' and I asked what other movies they had coming up," he explained. "It was 'Planet of the Apes' and other stuff. They said I might want to see 'Deadpool.' So I said, 'Sure, send it to me.' Almost just out of curiosity. And if I really, really wanted to do it, maybe I could figure out a way to do it. But that wasn't really going to happen. I just couldn't fit it in with other projects." "People send you scripts all the time to read," he added. "They'll send the same script out to 20 different directors, but for some reason
